Roblox is one of the biggest apps in the world, and you've probably been hearing its name: the company recently went public, and its stock price climbed so high it was temporarily worth more than gaming giants EA and Take-Two combined. Roblox has come up as a contentious topic in the Epic Games v. Apple trial as well.

That might have been just legal manoeuvring, but the question will eventually arise: who gets to decide what appears on the Metaverse? Given Roblox's significant audience of under-13s, the company is understandably keen on safety, employing over 3,000 people around the world to screen for inappropriate content. That is good news if you're a parent, but bad if you're a creator in a hypothetical future where a moderated Metaverse becomes the primary conduit for entertainment consumption and your work is judged sufficiently inappropriate.

"People can also be whoever they want to be on the platform, and this authenticity is an important part of their self-expression, be it in real life or in the Metaverse." He points to the recent Gucci Garden event, which saw a virtual bag eventually sell for around $4,115. Its physical counterpart costs $3,400. The bag cannot be transferred out of Roblox, suggesting that some users place primacy on how their avatars look over being able to flaunt these items in the physical world. Plenty of brands have started selling legally licensed digital product replicas, including Nike Air Max trainers and NFL merchandise.
